VATICAN CITY- As the synod on the Amazon region has ended the bishops who gathered to discuss the region's challenges and make recommendations to Pope Francis will begin preparing their final report. Their words could have a profound impact not only on the Amazon but the entire church, as the ideas they present about protecting the environment, the rights of indigenous people as well as adaptation of church practices to local cultures are theoretically applicable anywhere. The final report from the synod, which has been meeting since Oct 6, will be put together by a drafting committee made up of bishops elected by the synod and appointed by the pope. After discussion and revisions, the report will be voted on paragraph by paragraph. Passage of any one paragraph requires a two-thirds vote. Only the 185 official delegates to the synod (almost all of them bishops) can vote. The drafting committee will work with input from 12 synod groups that met to discuss the issues. The groups were organised by language (two Italian, four Portuguese, five Spanish, and one for England and French speakers). Each group of about 20 contained bishops, lay observers and experts who participated equally in the discussion.
